

Within the confines of New Denver, a few blocks from the business section, a large settlement has been built on the side of an old orchard and takes its name from it. Life in the Orchard is much the same as in the other spots.

Each small community has a committee to look after many of the details of living. The Orchard committee goes into session in its meeting place in the same building as the post office.

This man is using a Japanese style plane as he builds a boat for use in the lake nearby.

Home improvement work goes on constantly. A pumping station was necessary for fresh water, so effort was expended to make it decorated.

Life isn't all work in the Orchard.

This is a tense moment in a game of Japanese chess.

As the village was built right on the shore of the Slocan Lake, a fine beach is available for swimming and sunning, with beneficial effects to health.

Relocation has resulted in an improvement in the general health level.
